H.R. 4022

Russian Anti-Ship Missile Nonproliferation Act of 2000

As ordered reported by the House Committee on International Relations on April 13, 2000

H.R. 4022 would prohibit the President from rescheduling or forgiving any bilateral debts of Russia until the President either certifies that Russia has ended all transfers of Moskit anti-ship missiles to other countries or waives that prohibition and certifies that the waiver is vital to U.S. national security. The bill would require the President to report to the Congress on the status of any missile transfers to China. CBO estimates the additional reporting requirement would cost less than $500,000, assuming the appropriation of the necessary funds. Although the other budgetary impacts of enacting the bill are highly uncertain, CBO estimates that they would not be significant. Because the bill could affect direct spending and receipts, pay-as-you-go procedures would apply.

In August 1999, creditor countries agreed to reschedule payments on Soviet-era debts coming due between July 1, 1999, and December 31, 2000. Rescheduling those payments would increase the likelihood that the debt would be repaid. Under that 1999 agreement, the United States would create a new debt instrument out of the $496 million due on World War II lend-lease loans and agricultural commodity credits extended to the Soviet Union before December 31, 1991. That amount plus interest would be repaid over the 2001-2020 period. The United States has not yet signed the bilateral accord with Russia that would implement the multilateral agreement.

CBO assumes that the two most likely events under H.R. 4022 are that either Russia would agree to end shipments of the missiles or the President would use the waiver authority. If either of these outcomes occur, the bill would not affect direct spending or receipts. If neither of those outcomes occur, the United States would be unable to reschedule Russia's debts under the bill. Not rescheduling Russia's debts would increase net outlays from the forgone payments due upon signing of the bilateral agreement. A Russian default on its lend-lease loans could affect governmental receipts because Russia could lose its normal trade relations status thus affecting tariff collections.

H.R. 4022 contains no intergovernmental or private-sector mandates as defined in the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act and would not affect the budgets of state, local, or tribal governments.
